We are all set to roll out the Chromecast S3 on the 27th of April as the hotel that we are staying in, the Hilton hotel is an Ibis hotel, which means we're the first in the world to get the new S3. The S2 is all the way up in the UK in Surrey and they've been working for the last month on getting this ready to go out into the wild. The S2 has been retooled with a new design, a much more powerful chip, a new dock and a new remote as well, they've also improved the whole process of shipping. This is probably the best picture I could get of the S2. Here's the full announcement of the launch: "British Airways, and others, are building applications to ce6e30c18e

U.S. seeks savings as cases surge in costliest year WASHINGTON – The Ebola crisis is shaping up to be the most expensive one in U.S. history. The costliest year on record is ahead with more than $4 billion already spent to contain the virus in West Africa, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. The news was overshadowed by two other recent but less costly fiscal crises – the partial shutdown of the U.S. government and the deadly mass shooting at a Florida high school. Because Ebola isn't a public health emergency that generally triggers a federal response, the White House and Congress are not creating new funds or otherwise providing additional resources. Instead, the government is directing its response to the epidemic using resources already earmarked for overseas military operations and domestic agencies dealing with emergency diseases. "Ebola is certainly the biggest financial burden on the U.S. budget so far, but it's also the least expensive government response to date," said Joseph Thorndike, the director of the Tax History Center at Tax Analysts in Washington. "It's not a one-time transaction." The Congressional Budget Office's latest assessment puts Ebola at $5.6 billion in direct spending and an additional $1.5 billion in indirect costs over the next fiscal year. Its budget office said it would likely cost more than $2 billion a month if the U.S. and its international partners continue the pace of helping impoverished countries battle the epidemic. The total cost of the conflict is now pegged at $6.5 billion since it began this year. Earlier estimates pegged the total at about $3.6 billion. Ebola is deadly and can kill up to 90 percent of victims, so there is a chance the total will grow as more West Africans develop infections.
